Monthly commentary

Megaport (MP1) outperformed despite no material newsflow during the month. Management have recently undertaken a number of initiatives contributing to a stabilisation of the NRR.

A significant development is the advancement of the MVE platform, enabling the rapid deployment of new software products without requiring additional infrastructure investment. This allows Megaport to leverage its existing hardware capacity and global network to offer innovative services like Cloud Routers and NAT Gateway. This strategic shift positions Megaport for substantial growth through software innovation and capitalizes on the economic advantages of their blended internet product offering.

Block (XYZ) recovered in April, following March underperformance amid rising concerns about a weakening US consumer affecting both Square Seller and Cash App. Although the business faces limited direct exposure to tariffs, investors worry that its guidance of 15% gross profit growth for 2025 could be revised downward in a softening US economy. We acknowledge this possibility; however, our investment thesis transcends cyclical shifts in consumer spending and centers on the structural, company-driven drivers of XYZ's profit growth. The core business case remains intact. While our valuation assessment inevitably reflects cyclical factors like consumer spending, XYZ'

Nuix (NLX) underperformed this month. The company had previously issued a release that included a change in the annual contract value (ACV) guidance from ~15% to a range of 11%-16% for the full year. EBITDA Jaws were re-affirmed with operating growth to be below revenue growth. The company was however free cash flow (FCF) positive during the half, and will remain FCF positive at the FY.
